

The AI-Powered Real Estate Writing System

Write listing copy that stops the scroll, moves buyers, and closes faster — in 90 seconds.

LISTWORKS · LISTWORKS.IO

The AI-Powered Real Estate Writing System

Full Outline & Table of Contents

Draft v0.1 — 2026-04-16

POSITIONING BRIEF

Title: The AI-Powered Real Estate Writing System

Subtitle: How Top Agents Write Listings That Sell in 90 Seconds — and How You Can Too

Price: $20

Feel: $200 — premium, practical, no fluff

Target buyer: Real estate agents who hate writing listing copy (i.e., most of them)

Core promise: You will never stare at a blank MLS description again. Ever.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

FOREWORD

Why Most Listing Descriptions Are Leaving Money on the Table

A short, punchy opener that calls out the industry norm: copy-paste, generic, forgettable. Sets the stage for why this guide exists and what's possible when you treat words like a sales tool.

PART ONE: THE FOUNDATION

Understanding What Actually Sells Homes (It's Not the Features)

Chapter 1 — Buyers Don't Buy Houses, They Buy Feelings

The psychology behind every listing that sells fast

- The 3-second scroll test: what buyers actually see first
 - Emotional vs. transactional language (and why most agents get this backwards)
 - The 4 emotional triggers that move buyers to action:
 1. Belonging ("I can see my life here")
 2. Status ("This is who I want to be")
 3. Safety ("This is a smart decision")
 4. Urgency ("I could lose this")
 - Why square footage, bedroom count, and "updated kitchen" kill momentum
 - Framework: Feature → Benefit → Feeling (FBF)
-

Chapter 2 — The Anatomy of a High-Converting Listing

What separates the 3-day sales from the 90-day sits

- The 5-part listing structure that works every time
 - The opening hook: your one job in the first sentence
 - The lifestyle paragraph: painting the life, not the property
 - The feature translation layer: how to make specs sound desirable
 - The call to action: soft sells that create urgency without desperation
 - Length, tone, and format for MLS vs. social vs. ads
 - Annotated example: full listing breakdown, line by line
-

Chapter 3 — Buyer Psychology by Property Type

How to match your copy to your buyer

- First-time buyers: reassurance, simplicity, pride of ownership
- Move-up buyers: status, space, neighborhood narrative
- Downsizers: ease, lifestyle liberation, low-maintenance freedom
- Investors: ROI language, numbers, opportunity framing

- Luxury buyers: exclusivity, experience, discretion
 - Quick-reference cheat sheet by buyer type
-

PART TWO: THE SYSTEM

The 90-Second AI Writing Method

Chapter 4 — Setting Up Your AI Writing Engine

Tools, prompts, and the 5-minute setup you only do once

- Which AI tools work best for real estate copy (and the one to avoid)
- The ListWorks Master Prompt: your permanent starting template
- How to feed the AI a property — the Property Input Sheet
- Training your AI with your brand voice (a 10-minute exercise)
- Saving your setup so every future listing takes 90 seconds

[TOOL INCLUDED]: The Property Input Sheet template (copy + paste ready)

Chapter 5 — The 90-Second Listing Workflow

Step-by-step: from blank page to polished copy

Step 1 — Fill out your Property Input Sheet (60 seconds)

- What to include: the 12 fields that matter
- What to skip: the stuff AI doesn't need

Step 2 — Run your Master Prompt (10 seconds)

- Paste, send, done

Step 3 — Review and personalize (20 seconds)

- The 3-word tweak that makes AI copy sound human
- What to always check before publishing
- When to let it go and when to rewrite

Step 4 — Export to formats (10 seconds)

- MLS-ready version
- Social caption version (Instagram, Facebook)
- Ad headline set (3 variations)

[WORKFLOW DIAGRAM]: Visual flowchart of the 90-second process

Chapter 6 — Prompts That Actually Work

The complete ListWorks prompt library

- The Standard Listing Prompt (MLS)
- The Luxury Listing Prompt
- The Fixer-Upper / Investment Prompt
- The Condo / Urban Lifestyle Prompt
- The New Construction Prompt
- The "Challenging Property" Prompt (odd layout, busy street, small yard)
- The Social Media Caption Prompt (Instagram, Facebook, LinkedIn)
- The Email Blast Prompt
- The Open House Invite Prompt
- The Just Listed / Just Sold Prompt
- Prompt modifiers: tone, length, urgency, buyer persona

[CHEAT SHEET]: All prompts in one printable reference page

PART THREE: BEFORE & AFTER

Real Listings. Real Transformations.

Chapter 7 — Before & After: 10 Real Listing Rewrites

See exactly what changes and why

Each example includes:

- × The original (what most agents write)
- □ The AI-powered rewrite (what sells)
- □ The breakdown (what changed and the psychology behind it)

Example set:

1. The suburban 3/2 that sounds like every other 3/2 → transformed with lifestyle narrative
 2. The small condo with "cozy" problems → reframed as urban freedom
 3. The luxury listing that listed features but sold nothing → rewritten for status and exclusivity
 4. The fixer-upper that scared buyers away → reframed as opportunity copy
 5. The new construction with zero personality → given a neighborhood story
 6. The dated ranch with "good bones" → rewritten with pride and potential
 7. The investment property pitched to the wrong buyer → reframed for ROI buyers
 8. The open house description nobody read → turned into an experience invitation
 9. The social media caption that got 2 likes → rewritten for engagement
 10. The email blast that felt like spam → rewritten to feel personal and useful
-

PART FOUR: BEYOND THE MLS

Turning One Listing Into a Full Marketing System

Chapter 8 — The Full Listing Marketing Stack

One property. Seven content pieces. Done in 10 minutes.

- MLS description (primary)
- Instagram caption + hashtag set
- Facebook post (longer form, story-driven)
- LinkedIn post (market insight angle)
- Email to your list (just listed)
- Open house invite copy
- Ad headline set (3 variations for paid social/Google)

The Full Stack prompt: one input, seven outputs

Chapter 9 — Your Brand Voice System

So every listing sounds like you, not a robot

- Why brand voice matters in a commoditized market
 - The 3-word brand voice exercise
 - Building your personal voice modifier prompt
 - Consistency across platforms
 - The "sniff test": does this sound like me?
-

Chapter 10 — Scaling Without Burning Out

Using this system to handle more listings with less stress

- Batching: writing a week of copy in 30 minutes
 - Templates for recurring situations (price reductions, expired re-lists, seasonal)
 - Building a content calendar from your active listings
 - When to bring in design (True North Graphics integration)
 - How top producers use systems like this to look like a team of one
-

BONUS SECTION

Bonus 1 — The Quick-Win Prompt Pack

10 ready-to-use prompts for the situations agents hate most

- "I have nothing good to say about this property"
 - "The seller is unrealistic about what the home offers"
 - "I need to rewrite a stale listing that won't sell"
 - "I need copy for a listing in a neighborhood I don't know well"
 - "The photos are bad but the home is great"
 - ... and 5 more
-

Bonus 2 — The Listing Description Checklist

Before you hit publish, run this 60-second check

A printable one-page checklist covering:

- Hook quality
 - Emotional language present
 - No filler phrases (updated, spacious, must-see, etc.)
 - Buyer persona match
 - Call to action included
 - Platform-appropriate length
-

Bonus 3 — Banned Words List

The 40 phrases killing your listings

The words and phrases that every agent uses and every buyer ignores — with replacements.

Examples:

- "Spacious" → describe what fits in the space
- "Must see!" → tell them what they'll see

- "Updated kitchen" → describe the update and what it means for their life
 - "Cozy" → own it or reframe it
 - "Motivated seller" → never, ever, ever
-

CLOSING

You Now Have an Unfair Advantage

A short close that reinforces the transformation, invites them to subscribe for ongoing packages, and introduces the ListWorks subscription offer.

CTA: Ready to never write listing copy yourself again? → [ListWorks $49/month]

APPENDIX

- A: Property Input Sheet (full template)
 - B: Master Prompt Library (all prompts, printable)
 - C: Banned Words List (printable)
 - D: Listing Description Checklist (printable)
 - E: Buyer Psychology Quick Reference by Property Type
-

PRODUCTION NOTES

Element	Count
Chapters	10 + Bonus section
Before/After examples	10
Prompt templates	15+
Printable tools	5
Estimated page count	60-80 pages
Estimated read time	2-3 hours
Tone	Confident, direct, zero fluff

Next: Begin drafting Chapter 1 content. Then Chapter 5 (the 90-second workflow) — highest perceived value, should be done early.

CHAPTER 1

Buyers Don't Buy Houses. They Buy Feelings.

The psychology behind every listing that sells fast — and every one that doesn't.

Here's something your MLS board will never tell you:

Nobody has ever bought a house.

They've bought the feeling of finally having a backyard where their kids can run wild. They've bought the version of themselves who hosts dinner parties in that kitchen. They've bought the quiet Sunday morning on that specific porch, coffee in hand, the world not yet awake.

The house was just the delivery mechanism.

This is the single most important thing to understand about real estate writing — and almost nobody does. Most listing descriptions read like spec sheets. Bedrooms. Bathrooms. Square footage. "Updated kitchen." "New roof." A breathless list of features that tells a buyer what they're getting and says absolutely nothing about why they should care.

Buyers don't make decisions with spreadsheets. They make decisions with their gut, then use the spreadsheet to justify it afterward.

Your copy needs to talk to the gut first.

The 3-Second Scroll Test

Before we get into the framework, let's establish what you're actually up against.

When a buyer opens a listing on Zillow, Realtor.com, or the MLS, they are not reading. They are scanning. Their thumb is moving. They are making a subconscious go/no-go decision in under three seconds based on the photos — and then, if the photos pass, they glance at your description.

That glance lasts maybe five seconds. If the first sentence doesn't land, they're gone.

You don't get a second chance at a first impression in real estate copy. You get a first sentence.

Most first sentences look like this:

"Welcome to this beautiful 4-bedroom, 3-bathroom home in the heart of [neighborhood]!"

That sentence communicates exactly one thing: that the person who wrote it wasn't trying very hard.

"Beautiful" is the most overused adjective in real estate. "Welcome to" is a verbal throat-clear. "In the heart of" means nothing. And leading with the bedroom count tells the buyer something they already saw in the search filter.

You've wasted five seconds and said nothing.

Here's what five seconds of real copy can do instead:

"The kind of home you describe to people who weren't there — wide-plank floors, a kitchen that actually fits two people, and a backyard that makes you wonder why you ever thought a condo was enough."

Same house. Completely different feeling. One of these stops the scroll. The other accelerates it.

Why Features Don't Sell Homes

Features are facts. Facts don't move people.

Think about the last major purchase you made — a car, a piece of furniture, a vacation. Did you choose it because of the technical specifications? Or did you choose it because of how it made you feel, and then use the specs to confirm you weren't being irrational?

Real estate is no different. Buyers experience your listing emotionally first, then rationalize with logic.

The problem is that most agents write for the logical brain. They lead with facts because facts feel safe and defensible. "3,200 square feet" is objective. "A home that finally has room for everything" is subjective — and that feels risky.

But "risky" is where sales live.

Consider the difference:

Feature-first	Feeling-first
"Open floor plan"	"The layout that makes parties feel effortless"
"Large master suite"	"A bedroom that actually feels like a retreat"
"Updated kitchen"	"A kitchen where you'll actually want to cook"
"Mature trees in backyard"	"Shade in the summer, color in the fall, and privacy year-round"
"Quiet street"	"The kind of block where neighbors still wave"

Notice that the feeling-first versions aren't dishonest — they're evocative. They take the same fact and translate it into an experience. That's the job of real estate copy.

The Feature → Benefit → Feeling Framework

This is the engine behind every piece of copy in this guide. Once you internalize it, you'll never write a flat listing again.

Here's how it works:

Feature — What the property has

Benefit — What that feature does for the buyer

Feeling — How that benefit makes the buyer feel

Most agents stop at Feature. Some make it to Benefit. The best — and the rarest — make it all the way to Feeling.

Let's walk through it:

Example 1: The Garage

- Feature: 2-car garage with extra storage
- Benefit: Room for both cars plus bikes, tools, and gear — nothing living in the living room
- Feeling: The version of your life where everything has a place

Copy that uses all three:

"A two-car garage with enough room left over that your bikes, your tools, and your holiday decorations all have a home — and none of them are living in your living room."

Example 2: The Kitchen

- Feature: Quartz countertops, gas range, large island
- Benefit: Real cooking space — not a kitchen you work around, a kitchen that works with you
- Feeling: The confidence of someone who finally has the right kitchen

Copy that uses all three:

"Quartz counters, a gas range that means business, and an island big enough for prep, homework, and a glass of wine at the end of a long day. This is the kitchen you've been compromising away from."

Example 3: The Backyard

- Feature: Fenced backyard with mature landscaping and patio
- Benefit: Private outdoor space that's ready to use — no projects, no waiting
- Feeling: Permission to exhale

Copy that uses all three:

"The backyard is already done — fenced, landscaped, with a patio that's begging for a table and some chairs. No weekend projects. Just outside, whenever you want it."

Practice this on every feature before you write a word of copy. Ask three questions in sequence:

1. What does this do?
2. What does it mean for this buyer's life?
3. How does it make them feel?

The answer to question 3 is your copy.

The 4 Emotional Triggers That Move Buyers to Act

Every buyer who walks through a listing — physically or digitally — is running an unconscious checklist. Not a checklist of features. A checklist of feelings.

There are four core emotional triggers in residential real estate. Learn to write toward them and your listings will consistently outperform the market.

Trigger 1: Belonging

"I can see my life here."

This is the most powerful trigger in residential real estate, and it activates when the buyer can visualize themselves inhabiting the space — not just visiting it.

Belonging copy uses specific, concrete detail. Not "great for entertaining" but "the kitchen where people end up even when dinner's in the other room." Not "family-friendly" but "the neighborhood where kids still ride bikes until the streetlights come on."

Specificity creates believability. Believability creates connection. Connection creates belonging.

In your copy, this sounds like:

"The kind of house that gets called home about three minutes after you walk in."

"A street where you'll know your neighbors' names within a week — and be glad you do."

"The dining room where holidays actually happen."

Trigger 2: Status

"This is who I want to be."

Every home purchase is also an identity purchase. Buyers are not just choosing a property — they're choosing the version of themselves who lives there.

Status doesn't mean luxury. A first-time buyer achieving homeownership is a status move. A growing family upsizing to a neighborhood with better schools is a status move. An empty-nester downsizing to a beautifully designed smaller home is a status move.

Status copy speaks to aspiration. It shows the buyer the elevated version of their life — without being pretentious about it.

In your copy, this sounds like:

"The kind of address that answers the question before you finish asking it."

"A home that does the work of explaining you — before anyone's even inside."

"For the buyer who's done compromising."

Trigger 3: Safety

"This is a smart decision."

Buying a home is terrifying. It's the largest financial decision most people will ever make, and the emotional brain knows it. Safety copy quiets the fear by making the buyer feel intelligent, not impulsive.

Safety isn't just about security systems and safe neighborhoods (though those matter). It's about making the buyer feel like they'd be making a smart, defensible choice — one they'd be proud to explain to skeptical friends and family.

Safety copy leads with substance: location, value, durability, demand.

In your copy, this sounds like:

"In a market where inventory is tight, this one won't wait."

"A neighborhood where values have held — and then some."

"Updated mechanicals, newer roof, nothing waiting to surprise you."

"The kind of buy that feels smart on day one and smarter every year after."

Trigger 4: Urgency

"I could lose this."

Loss aversion is one of the most powerful forces in human psychology. People work harder to avoid losing something than to gain something of equal value. Urgency copy activates this by creating a credible sense that waiting means missing out.

The key word is credible. "Won't last!" is noise — buyers have learned to ignore it. Real urgency is specific and grounded in reality: the location, the condition, the market, the uniqueness of the property.

In your copy, this sounds like:

"Properties on this street average 4 days on market. This one won't rewrite that trend."

"Turnkey homes in this price range are rare. This is the one people wait for — and then kick themselves when it's gone."

"There is exactly one of these. Act accordingly."

Matching Triggers to Buyer Type

Not every trigger works for every buyer. Part of writing effective listing copy is identifying who your likely buyer is — and leading with the trigger that speaks to them.

Buyer Type	Primary Trigger	Secondary Trigger
First-time buyer	Safety	Belonging
Young family	Belonging	Safety
Move-up buyer	Status	Belonging
Luxury buyer	Status	Urgency
Downsizer	Belonging	Safety
Investor	Safety	Urgency
Relocation buyer	Belonging	Safety

We'll go deeper on each buyer type in Chapter 3. For now, the key takeaway: know your buyer before you write your first word. The same property, marketed to different buyers, needs completely different emotional framing.

The Language Audit

Before you start writing any listing, do this quick audit. Read through your draft — or your last three listings — and ask:

Red flags (feature-first thinking):

- Does my first sentence start with "Welcome to"?
- Do I use the words "spacious," "cozy," "updated," or "must see"?
- Do I lead with bedroom and bathroom counts?
- Does any sentence tell the buyer what something is without telling them what it means?
- Could this description be copy-pasted onto any other listing?

Green flags (feeling-first thinking):

- Does my first sentence stop the scroll?
- Can the buyer see themselves in this copy?
- Have I translated every major feature into a benefit and a feeling?
- Does this copy activate at least one of the four emotional triggers?
- Is there anything in here that's specific only to this property?

If you're checking red flags, don't rewrite yet. Keep reading. By the time you finish this guide, you'll have a system that makes feeling-first writing automatic.

Chapter Summary

- Buyers make emotional decisions and rationalize them with logic — write for emotion first.
 - You have one sentence to stop the scroll. Make it count.
 - Features don't sell homes. The feelings that features create sell homes.
 - Use the Feature → Benefit → Feeling framework on every element before you write.
 - The 4 emotional triggers are: Belonging, Status, Safety, Urgency.
 - Match your trigger to your buyer type before you write a word.
-

Coming up in Chapter 2: Now that you know what to make buyers feel, we'll look at how to structure a listing that delivers that feeling from the first sentence to the last — and what separates the 3-day sales from the 90-day sits.

— End of Chapter 1 —

CHAPTER 2

The Anatomy of a High-Converting Listing

What separates the 3-day sales from the 90-day sits

Two listings. Same price point. Same neighborhood. Same market conditions.

One goes under contract in 72 hours with multiple offers. The other sits for six weeks, gets a price reduction, and finally closes below ask — to a buyer who negotiated hard because they sensed desperation.

The difference is almost never the property.

It's almost always the copy.

Most agents treat listing descriptions like a formality — something to fill in after the photos are uploaded. The pros treat it like a sales tool. And the gap in outcomes between those two approaches is not small.

This chapter is a master class in structure. You'll learn the five parts of a high-converting listing, how each part does a specific job, and exactly how to execute each one. By the end, you'll have a framework you can use on any property, at any price point, in any market.

Let's build it from the ground up.

The 5-Part Listing Structure That Works Every Time

A great listing description isn't a random collection of sentences. It's a structure — a deliberate sequence that moves a buyer from curiosity to conviction.

Here are the five parts:

1. The Opening Hook — Stops the scroll, earns the read
2. The Lifestyle Paragraph — Sells the life, not the specs
3. The Feature Translation Layer — Converts specs into desire
4. The Neighborhood & Context — Places the buyer in the world of this home
5. The Call to Action — Creates urgency without begging

Each section has exactly one job. When you know the job, you can write toward it. When you don't, you fill space with adjectives — and adjectives don't close deals.

Part 1: The Opening Hook

Your One Job in the First Sentence

You already know from Chapter 1 that you have about five seconds before a buyer moves on. The opening hook is where you spend those seconds.

Your one job in the first sentence is not to describe the house. It's to make the buyer feel something that makes them want to keep reading.

That's it. One job. Don't add more.

The most common mistake agents make with opening hooks is leading with information instead of feeling. Information is what the buyer came for. Feeling is what stops them.

Bad Opens vs. Great Opens

Here's what bad looks like — and why it fails:

x Bad:

"Welcome to this stunning 4-bedroom, 3-bath home in desirable Maple Creek!"

What went wrong:

- "Welcome to" is filler — it says nothing and signals low effort
- "Stunning" is the most overused word in real estate
- Leading with the bedroom count tells the buyer what they already saw in the filter
- "Desirable" is a claim without proof — every neighborhood is "desirable" in the listing

x Bad:

"Don't miss this beautiful move-in ready home with updated kitchen and open floor plan!"

What went wrong:

- "Don't miss" is panic energy, not urgency
- "Beautiful," "updated," and "open floor plan" are the three most generic phrases in residential real estate
- Still no image in the buyer's mind

Now here's what a great opener does instead:

□ Great:

"Three years ago, the sellers almost didn't put in an offer — the commute felt like a stretch. Now they'd tell you it's the best decision they ever made."

Why it works:

- It tells a story — instantly human
- It raises a question in the buyer's mind ("what changed?")
- It creates social proof without being corporate about it
- Zero clichés

□ Great:

"The kind of home you describe to people who weren't there — wide-plank floors, a kitchen that actually fits two people, and a backyard that finally ends the 'we need more space' conversation."

Why it works:

- Specific, concrete detail (wide-plank floors, kitchen for two)
- Activates the Belonging trigger from the first clause
- The buyer can see themselves in it

□ Great:

"This house does that thing where it feels bigger every time you walk in."

Why it works:

- Short, confident, specific
- Creates a sensory experience before the buyer visits
- Implies quality and design without naming either

The rule for great openers: Make the buyer feel something before you tell them anything.

Part 2: The Lifestyle Paragraph

Painting the Life, Not the Property

If the opening hook is the doorbell, the lifestyle paragraph is the view from the front porch. This is where you sell the experience of living in this home — not the components of it.

Most agents skip this entirely. They go straight from a generic opener into a bullet list of features. That's a missed opportunity worth thousands of dollars.

The lifestyle paragraph does something no feature list can do: it gives the buyer a day-in-the-life preview. It makes the purchase feel real before they've scheduled a showing.

Here's what that looks like in practice:

✗ Without a lifestyle paragraph (feature dump):

"This 4-bed, 3-bath home features an open floor plan, updated kitchen with quartz countertops, primary suite with walk-in closet, finished basement, and two-car garage."

That tells the buyer what the house is. It says nothing about what it's like to live there.

☐ With a lifestyle paragraph:

"Morning starts in the kitchen — real coffee, real light, the kind of open layout where no one gets stuck in a corner. Kids eat at the island while you finish getting ready. By 8 a.m., everyone's out the door without a collision. After school, the basement becomes its own world. Come evening, the back patio earns its keep — string lights, dinner outside, the kind of yard that makes you forget you have neighbors. This is what the square footage is actually for."

Same house. Completely different picture.

How to Write a Lifestyle Paragraph

1. Picture your buyer — A young family? A couple downsizing? A remote worker? The life you paint depends entirely on who's painting it for.
2. Walk through a specific day — Morning routine, work from home, after school, evenings, weekends. Pick two or three moments that this property makes better.
3. Use concrete sensory detail — Not "great natural light" but "morning light through east-facing windows." Not "peaceful" but "quiet enough that the birds wake you up before the alarm."
4. Don't name the rooms — "The living room is spacious" is a feature. "The kind of room where everyone ends up even when dinner's in the other room" is a feeling.

The lifestyle paragraph should be 3-5 sentences, max. You're painting a scene, not writing a novel.

Part 3: The Feature Translation Layer

Making Specs Sound Desirable

This is where the Feature → Benefit → Feeling (FBF) framework from Chapter 1 does its heavy lifting.

Every home has features. Most listings just list them. A high-converting listing translates them — turning specs into the desires those specs actually fulfill.

Here's the principle: buyers don't want a quartz countertop. They want to cook without cringing. The countertop is just the mechanism. The desire is the real thing.

The FBF Reminder

Step	Question	Example
Feature	What does this property have?	9-foot ceilings
Benefit	What does that feature do for the buyer?	Every room feels larger than it measures
Feeling	How does that benefit make the buyer feel?	The quiet confidence of a home that doesn't feel like a compromise

Copy from the Feeling:

"Nine-foot ceilings throughout — every room breathes. It's the difference between a home that feels like enough and one that feels like more than you expected."

Before/After: Feature Translation in Action

Before (feature dump):

"Home features 3 bedrooms, 2 full baths, hardwood floors, gas fireplace, detached 2-car garage, partially fenced yard, and new HVAC installed in 2022."

What the buyer hears: a list.

After (FBF applied to each element):

"Three bedrooms, each one with room for real furniture. The primary gets the morning light. Hardwood floors throughout — no carpet, no guessing what's underneath. The gas fireplace means you can have a fire on a Tuesday without making it a whole thing. Out back, a two-car garage that has enough space left over for the bikes, the tools, and whatever you've been meaning to organize. New HVAC in 2022, so the first thing you replace won't be the mechanicals."

Same facts. Completely different reading experience.

Feature Translation by Category

Here are the translations agents most commonly get wrong:

Raw Feature	Translated Version
"Open floor plan"	"The layout that makes gatherings feel effortless — no one's stuck in the kitchen while everyone else is in the living room"
"Updated kitchen"	"A kitchen that was clearly designed by someone who actually cooks"
"New roof (2023)"	"One less conversation with your insurance agent"
"Finished basement"	"A floor plan that expands when you need it to"
"Walk-in closet"	"Enough room to have a system — and then actually use it"
"Corner lot"	"More yard, more light, and no neighbor on one side"
"Cul-de-sac location"	"The street kids can ride bikes on without you holding your breath"
"Original hardwood floors"	"The floors that cost more to replicate than the house cost to build"

You don't have to translate every single feature. Prioritize the three to five that will resonate most with your target buyer — then let the secondary features live in a brief, tight list.

Part 4: The Neighborhood & Context

Placing the Buyer in the World of This Home

People don't just buy a house. They buy a life radius.

Where can they get coffee on a Saturday morning? How long is the commute? Are the schools good? Will they know their neighbors? The neighborhood section answers these questions in the language of experience, not data.

This section is often treated as an afterthought — a sentence or two tacked on at the end. But for the right buyer, the neighborhood context is the deciding factor.

× Weak neighborhood copy:

"Conveniently located near shopping, restaurants, and top-rated schools."

That sentence applies to approximately 70% of all listings. It does nothing.

□ Strong neighborhood copy:

"Half a mile to the farmers market on Saturdays, four blocks to the elementary school, and a seven-minute highway on-ramp that doesn't feel like a compromise. The neighbors have been here long enough to know each other's names — and new enough that there's room for yours."

This version creates an image. It places the buyer in the neighborhood, living in it, rather than reading about it.

What to Include

- Walkability or proximity: Specific distances to specific places (coffee shop, park, school, train) — not vague "near everything"

- Commute reality: Be honest and specific. "22 minutes to downtown" is real. "Convenient location" is noise.
- Community feel: What kind of block is it? What does the street feel like on a Saturday afternoon?
- Schools: If they're strong, name them. If they're not a selling point, don't lie — just skip it.

Keep this section to 3–4 sentences. Enough to establish context. Not so much that it competes with the home itself.

Part 5: The Call to Action

Soft Sells That Create Urgency Without Desperation

The CTA is the section most agents either skip entirely or get catastrophically wrong.

Skip it, and you leave the buyer with no direction — they've read something compelling and then... nothing. What do they do next?

Panic-sell it, and you destroy everything you built. "DON'T WAIT — THIS WON'T LAST!" is the real estate equivalent of a car salesman saying "this deal is only good today." It signals that you're scared, not confident.

The right CTA creates a natural next step. It respects the buyer's intelligence. And when done well, it leverages real urgency — market conditions, uniqueness, timing — without manufactured pressure.

✗ Desperate CTA:

"Won't last! Schedule your showing TODAY before it's gone! Call now!!!"

Every punctuation mark here is subtracted credibility.

☐ Confident CTA:

"Properties like this — turnkey, this location, this condition — don't accumulate days on market. Showings begin Thursday. Offers reviewed Sunday."

□ Confident CTA (for a unique or premium listing):

"There's exactly one of this. If you've been waiting for the right one, this is a good time to stop waiting."

□ Confident CTA (low-pressure, schedule-oriented):

"Come see it in person — the photos do well, but the spaces do better. Schedule a private showing at the link above."

The CTA doesn't have to be long. Two sentences is enough. Its job is simple: tell the buyer what to do next, and give them one good reason to do it.

Length, Tone, and Format: MLS vs. Social vs. Ads

The same property needs three different versions of its story depending on where the copy lives. Using the same text everywhere is like wearing a suit to the beach and a swimsuit to the office — technically the same person, completely wrong context.

Format	Length	Tone	Primary Goal
MLS Description	250-500 words	Informative + evocative	Earn the showing
Social Media Caption	80-150 words	Conversational, punchy	Stop the scroll, drive DMs
Digital Ad Copy	25-50 words	Urgent, benefit-led	Drive clicks
Email to Buyer's List	150-250 words	Personal, story-forward	Create qualified interest
Property Flyer/Print	100-200 words	Polished, scannable	Support in-person visits

MLS: Earn the Showing

MLS copy should be complete enough that a buyer could make a decision to schedule — not complete enough that they feel they've already seen it. Lead with feeling, deliver the facts, close with urgency. Use the full 5-part structure.

Social: Hook in the First Line

Social media copy lives and dies in the first sentence because most platforms collapse longer text behind a "read more" link. Lead with your strongest hook. Skip the feature list entirely — send them to the MLS for that. Social's job is to create desire, not provide details.

Instagram example:

"A home that somehow feels bigger every time you walk in. Kitchen opens to the yard. Basement's ready for whatever you've been putting off. Showings start Thursday — link in bio."

Ads: One Benefit, One Click

Digital ad copy has almost no room — 25 to 50 words, sometimes less. Pick one benefit, make it vivid, and drive the click. No adjectives, no feature lists, no "welcome to."

Facebook/Instagram ad example:

"3 beds. Finished basement. Half a mile from the park. The kind of move-up home that doesn't stay listed long. Schedule a showing →"

The Fully Annotated Example

Here's a complete listing description — every line broken down so you can see exactly what's happening and why.

Property: 4-bed, 2.5-bath craftsman in a walkable neighborhood. Young families are the likely buyer. Asking price: $485,000.

"Three years ago, the sellers almost didn't put in an offer — the commute felt like a stretch. Today, they'd tell you it's the best decision they ever made."

What this does: Opens with a story, not a spec. Creates social proof. Raises a question (what changed?) that makes the buyer want to keep reading. Triggers Belonging.

"Mornings here have a rhythm: coffee at the island while the kids eat, light coming through the east-facing windows, everyone out the door without a collision. Weekends stretch differently — the backyard is big enough to matter, the neighborhood is quiet enough to hear it."

What this does: The lifestyle paragraph. Specific day-in-the-life preview. Two moments: weekday morning and weekend. Both paint the buyer in the home, not the home in isolation. Avoids naming rooms; speaks in experiences.

"The kitchen was renovated two years ago — quartz counters, a gas range that means business, and an island that earns its space. The primary suite gets the quiet end of the house and a walk-in closet that finally makes the 'we need more storage' conversation irrelevant. Original hardwood floors throughout the main level. The finished basement adds 600 square feet of flex space — currently a playroom, but the layout supports a home office, gym, or guest suite with no renovation required."

What this does: The feature translation layer. Four features (kitchen, primary suite, hardwood floors, basement), each translated through at least one layer of FBF. "Island that earns its space" = benefit. "Makes the storage conversation irrelevant" = feeling. "Flex space that supports a home office" = benefit. Notice there's no "spacious" or "stunning" anywhere in this paragraph.

"Millbrook is the kind of neighborhood that makes the commute math worth running. Six blocks to Jefferson Elementary, four minutes to the highway, and a Saturday farmers market that's been there longer than most of the houses. The kind of block where neighbors still wave, and new ones get welcomed."

What this does: Neighborhood & context. Specific distances to specific things. Establishes community feel without being cheesy. "Commute math worth running" ties back to the opening story.

"Turnkey homes in this condition, at this price point, in Millbrook, don't accumulate days on market. Showings begin Thursday. Offers reviewed Sunday evening."

What this does: The CTA. Market-grounded urgency (specific and credible). Clear timeline (Thursday showings, Sunday offers). No exclamation marks. No begging. Confident.

Full listing, assembled:

Three years ago, the sellers almost didn't put in an offer — the commute felt like a stretch. Today, they'd tell you it's the best decision they ever made.

Mornings here have a rhythm: coffee at the island while the kids eat, light coming through the east-facing windows, everyone out the door without a collision. Weekends stretch differently — the backyard is big enough to matter, the neighborhood is quiet enough to hear it.

The kitchen was renovated two years ago — quartz counters, a gas range that means business, and an island that earns its space. The primary suite gets the quiet end of the house and a walk-in closet that finally makes the "we need more storage" conversation irrelevant. Original hardwood floors throughout the main level. The finished basement adds 600 square feet of flex space — currently a playroom, but the layout supports a home office, gym, or guest suite with no renovation required.

Millbrook is the kind of neighborhood that makes the commute math worth running. Six blocks to Jefferson Elementary, four minutes to the highway, and a Saturday farmers market that's been there longer than most of the houses. The kind of block where neighbors still wave, and new ones get welcomed.

Turnkey homes in this condition, at this price point, in Millbrook, don't accumulate days on market. Showings begin Thursday. Offers reviewed Sunday evening.

Word count: 271 words. Every one of them working.

Before/After: Full Listing Comparison

Before — A real (bad) listing description:

"Welcome to this beautiful 4-bedroom, 2.5-bath home in Millbrook! This move-in ready gem features an updated kitchen with quartz countertops and stainless appliances, hardwood floors on the main level, large primary suite with walk-in closet, finished basement, and a lovely backyard. Two-car garage. Located near top-rated schools and convenient to shopping and dining. Don't miss your chance to own this stunning property — schedule your showing today!"

Word count: 78 words. Zero images created. Five clichés in three sentences.

After — The same listing, restructured:

See the annotated example above.

The after version is 271 words — longer, yes — but every word has a job. More importantly, it creates a specific experience in the buyer's mind. The before version could describe 40% of all listings on the MLS right now. The after version could only describe this one.

That's the difference.

Chapter Summary

- High-converting listings follow a 5-part structure: Hook, Lifestyle Paragraph, Feature Translation Layer, Neighborhood & Context, and CTA.
 - Your opening hook has one job: make the buyer feel something that earns the next sentence.
 - The lifestyle paragraph sells the experience of living in the home — not the specs.
 - Use the FBF framework to translate every major feature from a fact into a feeling.
 - The neighborhood section places the buyer in the life radius of the home — use specifics, not vague claims.
 - The CTA creates urgency that's grounded in reality, not desperation. A timeline and a credible reason are all you need.
 - MLS, social, and ads are three different formats that require three different versions. Same story. Different lens.
-

Coming up in Chapter 3: Structure gets you a great listing. But the best copy in the world lands flat if it's written for the wrong buyer. In Chapter 3, we'll build your buyer profiling system — so before you write a single word, you know exactly who you're writing for, what triggers them, and how to make them feel like this listing was written specifically for them. Because it will be.

— End of Chapter 2 —

Chapter 3 — Buyer Psychology by Property Type

How to Match Your Copy to Your Buyer

The listing description that converts a first-time buyer will bore an investor. The copy that thrills a luxury buyer will feel tone-deaf to a downsizer. One of the most expensive mistakes agents make in listing marketing is writing for themselves — using language they like, features they find impressive, adjectives that sound good in their head.

Real estate copy isn't about how you feel about the property. It's about who's reading and what they're trying to become.

In Chapter 1, you learned the four emotional triggers that drive every real estate decision:

- Belonging — I fit here. This is my people, my place.
- Status — This home says something about who I am.
- Safety — I won't get this wrong. I'll be protected.
- Urgency — If I don't move now, I'll lose something I want.

Every buyer type activates these triggers differently. Some need Safety first. Others lead with Status. Some want numbers; others want a feeling. Your job is to know which levers to pull — before you write a single word.

This chapter gives you the complete playbook for six distinct buyer profiles. Study it. Bookmark it. Refer to it every time you sit down to write.

Buyer Type 1: First-Time Buyers

What They're Really Buying

First-time buyers are not buying a property. They're buying proof that they made it. Homeownership is a milestone that carries enormous emotional weight — it means stability, adulthood, roots. The house is almost secondary to the feeling of crossing the threshold.

But underneath that excitement is a current of fear. They don't know what they don't know. They've heard horror stories — bad inspections, hidden repairs, buying at the wrong time. They want to believe this is the right move, and they're looking to the listing itself for reassurance that it's okay to want this.

Primary Trigger: Safety. Secondary Trigger: Belonging.

Safety dominates. First-time buyers need to feel like they're not walking into a trap. Words that signal stability, move-in readiness, and low-friction ownership lower their anxiety and move them toward action. Belonging comes second — they need to picture themselves in the neighborhood, in the kitchen, in the life this home represents.

Language to Use

- "Move-in ready" — removes fear of hidden work
- "Updated," "new," "recently replaced" — implies they won't inherit problems
- "Quiet street," "established neighborhood," "walkable to..." — community signals
- "Low-maintenance" — lowers perceived risk
- "Perfect for first-time buyers" — gives them explicit permission to see themselves here
- Concrete details: square footage, HOA (or lack of it), school district name

Language to Avoid

- "As-is" — alarm bells
- "Needs TLC" or "investor special" — sounds like a trap to a first-timer
- "Priced to move" — creates anxiety they're missing something
- "Motivated seller" — implies something is wrong
- Overly technical language about zoning, easements, lot splits

Sample Copy

This bright 3-bedroom ranch sits on a quiet cul-de-sac in the award-winning Ridgeline School District. The kitchen was fully updated in 2022 — new cabinets, countertops, and appliances — so you're moving in, not moving in to work. First-time buyers especially appreciate the low-maintenance yard and the attached two-car garage. This one's genuinely ready for you.

Buyer Type 2: Move-Up Buyers

What They're Really Buying

Move-up buyers already own a home. They know how this works. What they're buying is an identity upgrade — more space, yes, but more importantly, a statement about where they've arrived in life. The new neighborhood matters as much as the new square footage. So does the kitchen, the master suite, the address.

These buyers are trading one version of themselves for a better one. They want to walk through your listing and feel like they've leveled up.

Primary Trigger: Status. Secondary Trigger: Belonging.

Status is the engine here. The home needs to feel like an elevation — not just bigger, but better. Belonging matters because they're also buying into a new neighborhood identity. Will their kids go to the right school? Will the neighbors be their kind of people? Will the address signal something to the people in their life?

Language to Use

- "Entertainer's kitchen," "chef's kitchen" — performance and status
- "Primary suite retreat," "spa bath" — luxury elevation language
- "Sought-after neighborhood," "top-rated schools" — social proof
- "Upgraded," "designer," "custom" — implies intentional choices, not builder-grade
- Street names and neighborhood names when the address carries weight
- Reference to nearby amenities that imply lifestyle: golf courses, restaurants, trails

Language to Avoid

- "Cozy" — reads as small; move-up buyers are done with small
- "Functional" — too neutral; they want elevated
- "Great value" — undercuts the status signal
- "Starter home" (obviously)
- Generic neighborhood references with no weight

Sample Copy

Situated in one of Westfield's most recognized streets, this updated 4-bedroom home was redesigned for people who entertain and live well. The open-concept main floor connects a chef's kitchen — waterfall island, Thermador range, butler's pantry — to a great room that actually holds a crowd. The primary suite is its own wing. This is the house you've been working toward.

Buyer Type 3: Downsizers

What They're Really Buying

Downsizers have lived in their big house. They raised kids there, hosted holidays, accumulated decades of stuff. Now they're choosing differently — not because they failed, but because they've arrived. The smaller home represents freedom, not loss.

But the emotional dynamic is subtle. Downsizers are letting go of something that holds identity. Your copy needs to honor what they're leaving while making the next chapter feel like a reward, not a consolation prize.

Primary Trigger: Safety. Secondary Trigger: Status (reframed as freedom).

Safety drives the decision — they need to feel like this is the smart move, not a downgrade. Status gets reframed: the luxury of less, the intelligence of simplicity. A smaller, better home can carry its own status signal when framed correctly.

Language to Use

- "Low-maintenance," "lock-and-leave," "single-level" — practical freedom
- "Thoughtfully designed" — quality over quantity
- "Right-sized" — better than "smaller"
- "Resort-style community," "active adult" (when appropriate)
- "Close to..." — proximity to doctors, grocery, culture matters here
- Focus on finishes and quality, not square footage

Language to Avoid

- "Downsizing" itself (in copy) — they know; don't remind them
- Emphasizing what's missing vs. what's present
- "Starter" anything
- Youth-coded language ("perfect for young families," "great for kids")
- Big square footage comparisons

Sample Copy

No stairs. No yard maintenance. No wasted rooms. This single-level 2-bedroom in the gated Harborview community was designed for the way you want to live now — with high-end finishes, a covered patio, and a layout that's easy on both the schedule and the knees. Lock up and leave whenever you want. The house takes care of itself.

Buyer Type 4: Investors

What They're Really Buying

Investors look different from every other buyer type. They speak in cap rates and cash-on-cash return. They want numbers, comps, and rent history. But here's what most agents miss: investors are still emotional buyers. They're buying the feeling of being smart, building wealth, and making a move others don't see coming.

The emotional trigger isn't the same as a first-timer's, but it's just as real. Write to both the analytical mind and the ego underneath it.

Primary Trigger: Urgency. Secondary Trigger: Status (being the smart money).

Urgency matters because investors are opportunity-focused — they need to feel this deal will be gone if they hesitate. Status matters because the savvy investor identity is real; they want to feel like they're seeing something others are missing.

Language to Use

- Actual numbers: rent estimates, cap rate, price per square foot, ARV
- "Proven rental market," "high-demand corridor"
- "Value-add opportunity" — signals upside without screaming "it needs work"
- "Currently rented at $X," "long-term tenant in place"
- "Below market" — if true and defensible
- References to proximity to employers, universities, transit — demand drivers
- "Immediate cash flow" or "day-one income"

Language to Avoid

- Lifestyle language without data to back it up
- "Charming," "cozy," "one-of-a-kind" without context
- Emotional neighborhood narrative without demand signals
- Vague future potential with no supporting logic

Sample Copy

Currently generating $2,100/month with a long-term tenant in place, this 3-bed/2-bath in the Central District sits three blocks from the MetroLink station and half a mile from Regional Medical. Rents in this zip have climbed 11% over the past 24 months. The property is clean, cash-flowing, and ready to transfer. For an investor with a 1031 window, this one closes the gap.

Buyer Type 5: Luxury Buyers

What They're Really Buying

Luxury buyers are buying an experience — and a signal. The home tells a story about who they are to themselves and to others. At this price point, features are assumed. What they're evaluating is taste, rarity, and exclusivity. They want to feel like they discovered something that isn't available to everyone.

The trap most agents fall into with luxury copy is saying too much. Listing every feature, every upgrade, every included appliance. Luxury buyers are put off by desperation and overwhelmed by laundry lists. They respond to restraint.

Primary Trigger: Status. Secondary Trigger: Belonging (to a rare group).

Status is everything — but it's a specific kind of status. Not "look at all this stuff." More like: "This exists. Not many people will ever live here." Belonging operates as exclusivity — the sense that this home is for a certain kind of person, and that person is them.

Language to Use

- Architecture names, material provenance: "hand-hewn oak," "Venetian plaster," "Boffi kitchen"
- Understated but specific: "1.4 acres of complete privacy"
- Scarcity signals: "one of six," "rarely available," "the last undeveloped lot of its kind"

- Reference the experience, not the spec sheet: "wakes up to mountain views," "hosts without effort"
- Named architects or designers when relevant
- Keep sentences shorter; confidence doesn't need qualifiers

Language to Avoid

- "Luxury" itself — if you have to say it, you don't have it
- Exclamation points — ever
- Stacking adjectives: "stunning, breathtaking, magnificent"
- Feature dumps: listing 27 upgrades in sequence
- "Motivated seller" — catastrophic at this price point
- Approximations: say "4,600 sq ft" not "approximately 4,600 sq ft"

Sample Copy

Set behind a private gate on two acres at the end of a canyon road, this four-bedroom residence was designed by Studio North in collaboration with the land — not imposed on it. Every room frames a specific view. The kitchen is Boffi. The primary wing is its own structure. There are no neighbors in sight. Properties like this don't come back.

Buyer Type 6: Remote Workers / Lifestyle Buyers

What They're Really Buying

This buyer emerged from a fundamental shift in how people work — and has permanently changed what "location" means in real estate. The remote worker or lifestyle buyer isn't moving to a city for a job. They're moving to a place for a life. The home is their headquarters, their gym, their office, their reset.

They're buying flexibility. The freedom to work from anywhere made them realize most places they lived weren't where they'd choose to live. Now they're choosing. And they want the home — and the town — to reflect that choice back at them.

Primary Trigger: Belonging. Secondary Trigger: Safety (smart decision).

Belonging dominates: they need to see themselves in the lifestyle this home and this place enable. Safety comes second — because relocation is a big decision, and they need to feel like they've thought it through, not just escaped. Your copy should make both the home and the location feel like an intentional, intelligent choice.

Language to Use

- "Dedicated office," "bonus room," "separate workspace" — the home has to work
- Fast internet: "fiber internet available," "Gigabit connectivity" — non-negotiable for this buyer
- "Minutes from..." — trails, ski, lakes, restaurants
- Location-as-lifestyle framing: "live in the mountains without giving up the city"
- "Work from home" directly — they're not embarrassed by it
- Outdoor access, walkability, or proximity to nature
- Community that fits: "vibrant arts scene," "growing remote worker community"

Language to Avoid

- Heavy commute framing: "easy freeway access," "minutes to downtown office core"
- Urban density signals without lifestyle context
- No mention of internet or workspace (a red flag by omission)
- "Investment opportunity" framing — they're not here for that

Sample Copy

The dedicated home office has its own entrance and fiber-ready connectivity — set it up once and never think about it again. Outside the back door: 40 miles of trails, a ski resort 18 minutes away, and a mountain town that actually has things to do. The rest of the country is working from home. You'd be working from here.

Quick-Reference Cheat Sheet

Buyer Type	Primary Trigger	Secondary Trigger	Tone	Key Phrases	Avoid
First-Time Buyers	Safety	Belonging	Warm, reassuring, clear	Move-in ready, updated, quiet street, low-maintenance	As-is, TLC, motivated seller
Move-Up Buyers	Status	Belonging	Confident, aspirational	Chef's kitchen, primary suite, sought-after, designer	Cozy, functional, great value, starter
Downsizers	Safety	Status (as freedom)	Liberating, quality-focused	Low-maintenance, lock-and-leave, right-sized, single-level	Downsizing, missing features, young family
Investors	Urgency	Status (smart money)	Direct, data-driven	Cap rate, cash-flowing, below market, value-add, ARV	Vague potential, lifestyle-only, no numbers
Luxury Buyers	Status	Belonging (exclusive)	Restrained, precise, confident	Rare, private, [brand names], designed by, never available	"Luxury," exclamation points, feature dumps
	Belonging	Safety		Dedicated office, fiber,	Commute focus, no

Buyer Type	Primary Trigger	Secondary Trigger	Tone	Key Phrases	Avoid
Remote/ Lifestyle Buyers			Energetic, location- rich	minutes from, work from here	workspace mention, office-park framing

Chapter Summary

Most listing copy fails at the first sentence — not because the writing is bad, but because it's written for the wrong person.

Every buyer type carries a distinct emotional profile. First-timers need Safety before anything else. Move-up buyers want the Status signal. Downsizers respond to the freedom narrative, not the feature count. Investors need hard numbers with urgency underneath. Luxury buyers want restraint and rarity. Remote workers are buying a lifestyle headquarters and a place that chose back.

When you identify your most likely buyer before you write, you shift from describing a property to speaking directly to a person's desires and fears. That's when copy converts.

The four emotional triggers — Belonging, Status, Safety, Urgency — run through every buyer type. But they're weighted differently, activated differently, and expressed through completely different language. Now you have the map.

Your action step: Before your next listing, identify the primary buyer profile. Choose your dominant trigger. Then write the first paragraph with that buyer in your head — not the property in front of you.

Up Next: Chapter 4 — The ListWorks Formula

You understand the emotional architecture. You know your buyer. Now it's time to build the machine.

In Chapter 4, you'll get the complete ListWorks copy framework: the exact structure we use to write high-converting MLS descriptions in under 15 minutes. You'll learn the opening hook formula, how to sequence features for emotional impact, the closing line that creates urgency without sounding desperate, and how to adapt the same framework for social captions, ad headlines, and email subject lines — all from a single set of property notes.

One framework. Every surface. Every listing. That's Chapter 4.

Chapter 3 of The AI-Powered Real Estate Writing System

© ListWorks. All rights reserved.

CHAPTER 5

The 90-Second Listing Workflow

From blank page to polished, publish-ready copy — faster than most agents find the right adjective.

Let's get something out of the way.

When you tell other agents you can write a full listing package in 90 seconds — MLS description, social caption, ad headlines, all of it — they're going to look at you like you just said you drive to work by jet pack.

Let them look.

By the end of this chapter, you'll have a repeatable system that produces better copy than most agents write in an hour of staring at a blank screen. You'll use it every time. You'll wonder what you were doing before. And occasionally — if you're the type — you'll quietly enjoy watching someone spend forty-five minutes on a listing description while you're already on to the next thing.

This is the chapter you'll come back to. Bookmark it, print it, tape it to the wall above your monitor. It's that simple, and it's that good.

How the System Works (The 30-Second Overview)

The 90-Second Listing Workflow has four steps. They happen in sequence and they never change.

STEP 1 → Fill Your Property Input Sheet	(~60 seconds)
STEP 2 → Run Your Master Prompt	(~10 seconds)
STEP 3 → Review and Personalize	(~20 seconds)
STEP 4 → Export to Formats	(~10 seconds)
TOTAL: ~100 seconds

That's it. That's the system. Four steps, one tool, zero staring at blank screens.

The magic isn't in any single step. It's in the combination: a structured input that gives the AI everything it needs, a battle-tested prompt that tells it exactly what to do with that input, and a review step short enough that you actually do it instead of skipping it.

Let's walk through each step in full.

STEP 1 — Fill Out Your Property Input Sheet

The 60-second setup that makes everything else possible

The Property Input Sheet is the foundation of the entire system. It's a simple template — twelve fields — that you fill out before touching any AI tool. Think of it as a creative brief. You're not writing copy yet; you're gathering the raw material that the AI will transform into copy.

This matters because AI is only as good as what you feed it. A vague input produces vague output. A specific, well-structured input — even a quick one — produces copy that sounds like you knew what you were doing.

Here's the full template:

□ THE PROPERTY INPUT SHEET

PROPERTY INPUT SHEET

1. PROPERTY TYPE:

☐ Single family ☐ Condo/townhome ☐ Multi-family
☐ New construction ☐ Fixer/investment ☐ Luxury

2. LOCATION SNAPSHOT:

Neighborhood name: _____

One sentence about why people want to live there: _____

Walkability/proximity note (coffee, schools, trails, transit):

3. THE THREE BEST THINGS ABOUT THIS PROPERTY:

(Not bedrooms/baths – the things that made you stop and say "oh, nice")

1. _____

2. _____

3. _____

4. THE BUYER:

Who is most likely to buy this home?

(e.g., young family, first-timer, downsizer, investor, remote worker)

What do they care about most?

5. LIFESTYLE THIS HOME ENABLES:

Complete this sentence: "This home is for someone who wants to
_____"

6. THE FEATURE TRANSLATION LIST:

List up to 5 features, then answer "so what?" for each:

Feature 1: _____ → So what? _____

Feature 2: _____ → So what? _____

Feature 3: _____ → So what? _____

Feature 4: _____ → So what? _____

Feature 5: _____ → So what? _____

7. THE ONE THING:

If a buyer remembered only ONE thing about this listing, what should it be?

8. WHAT TO AVOID / SENSITIVE NOTES:

Anything to NOT mention? Angle to avoid? Seller preference?

9. PRICE RANGE / MARKET CONTEXT: (optional)

10. COMPARABLE LIFESTYLE / FEEL: (optional)

"The vibe of this home is like _____"
(e.g., "a restored craftsman in a coffee-shop neighborhood," "a luxury retreat that never feels showy")

11. TONE DIRECTION:

☐ Warm and personal ☐ Sharp and confident
☐ Sophisticated/quiet ☐ Energetic/aspirational
☐ Straightforward/honest

12. EXTRA NOTES:

Anything else the AI should know?

How to Fill It Fast

You already know this property. You walked it. You talked to the sellers. You know the neighborhood. The Input Sheet isn't asking you to research — it's asking you to organize what's already in your head.

Most agents can fill this out in 60 seconds, especially after the first few times. The fields that matter most:

- Field 3 (The three best things): Be specific. Not "updated kitchen" — "waterfall quartz island that seats four." Not "nice backyard" — "fully fenced with a new Trex deck and lights already strung."
- Field 4 (The buyer): This is the single most important creative decision you'll make. Everything downstream changes based on your answer here.
- Field 5 (The lifestyle): Finish that sentence and don't overthink it. Your gut answer is usually right.
- Field 7 (The one thing): If you can't answer this, the listing doesn't have a story yet. Find the story before you prompt.

What to skip: Don't fill in Field 9 or 10 unless they're obviously relevant. Don't overthink Field 12. The goal is organized, not exhaustive.

STEP 2 — Run Your Master Prompt

Paste. Send. Done.

This is where the system earns its name.

The Master Prompt is a pre-written, pre-tested instruction set that you paste into your AI tool every time — with your completed Property Input Sheet dropped in at the designated spot. You don't rewrite it. You don't tweak it per listing. You paste, insert, send.

Here it is:

□ THE LISTWORKS MASTER PROMPT

You are a professional real estate copywriter specializing in high-converting listing descriptions. Your writing is confident, specific, and emotionally resonant – it makes buyers feel something, then gives them the facts to justify that feeling.

You do not use filler phrases like "Welcome to," "Don't miss out," "Must see,"

"Spacious," "Cozy," or "Motivated seller." You write in clear, vivid, buyer-psychology-driven language that stops the scroll.

Using the property information below, generate a complete listing marketing package with the following four components:

1. MLS DESCRIPTION (200–250 words)

- Open with a scroll-stopping first sentence (no "Welcome to")
- Use the Feature → Benefit → Feeling framework throughout
- Activate at least one emotional trigger: Belonging, Status, Safety, or Urgency
- Close with a soft, confident call to action
- No bullet points – flowing, readable paragraphs

2. INSTAGRAM CAPTION (100–130 words + hashtags)

- Open with a hook line that works without an image
- Conversational and warm – feels personal, not promotional
- End with a question or CTA that invites engagement
- Include 15 targeted hashtags on a separate line

3. FACEBOOK POST (150–180 words)

- Slightly longer form, story-driven
- Speak to the lifestyle, not just the property
- End with a clear, low-pressure CTA (schedule a tour, DM for info, etc.)

4. AD HEADLINE SET (3 variations)

- Each headline under 10 words
- One leads with emotion, one with specificity, one with urgency
- Suitable for Facebook/Instagram paid ads or Google Display

PROPERTY INFORMATION:

[PASTE YOUR COMPLETED PROPERTY INPUT SHEET HERE]

Write all four components now. Do not add commentary, explanations, or notes between sections – just the copy, clearly labeled.

Where to Run It

The Master Prompt works with any major AI tool:

- ChatGPT (GPT-4o or higher) — paste directly into a new conversation
- Claude (Sonnet or Opus) — performs exceptionally well with structured prompts like this
- Gemini Advanced — solid results, especially for local/neighborhood flavor
- Copilot (Microsoft 365) — good option if you're already in the Microsoft ecosystem

Recommendation: Create a saved snippet or keyboard shortcut for the Master Prompt so you never have to find it. On Mac, use TextExpander, Alfred, or the built-in Text Replacement. On Windows, use AutoHotkey or Word's AutoCorrect shortcuts. One keyboard shortcut drops the entire prompt in any text field in under a second.

STEP 3 — Review and Personalize

The 20 seconds that make AI copy sound human

Here's the truth about AI-generated copy: it's 85% of the way there on the first pass. The remaining 15% is what separates a great listing from a generic one — and it takes about 20 seconds to close that gap.

This is not a full rewrite. It's a targeted scan with three specific things to look for.

The 20-Second Review Protocol

Read the MLS description once, quickly. Look for:

① The Fingerprint Word

Find one word or phrase that's distinctly yours — something with your voice in it — and drop it in somewhere in the first paragraph. It doesn't need to be dramatic. It could be a single adjective, a specific detail about the neighborhood you actually know, or a line about the sellers that gives the listing a human heartbeat.

This is what makes AI copy feel like you wrote it, not like a machine did. It takes 5 seconds and changes everything.

② The Banned Words Check

Scan quickly for these words and replace on sight:

- Spacious → describe what fits there
- Cozy → own it or reframe it
- Updated → specify the update
- Beautiful → show why; don't tell it
- Stunning → same rule
- Amazing → never
- Rare opportunity → prove rarity with specifics
- Won't last long → only if you can back it up with market data

AI is trained on listing copy that uses these words constantly. They will sneak in. Your job is to catch them. (Full banned words list in the appendix.)

③ The Truthfulness Check

Make sure nothing in the copy overstates, misrepresents, or implies something the property can't deliver. AI occasionally hallucinates specific details or applies language from similar properties. Read once for accuracy.

If it passes all three — and most outputs will — you're done. Ship it.

When to Actually Rewrite

Sometimes the output needs more than a tweak. That's okay. Here's when to rewrite and how to do it without starting over:

If the tone is wrong: Add a one-line modifier to your prompt and re-run.

Example: "Rewrite the MLS description only, with a warmer, more personal tone. This buyer is a young family, not a luxury buyer."

If the opening is weak: Rerun just the first paragraph: "Give me 5 alternative opening sentences for this listing. They should stop the scroll and activate the feeling of belonging."

If it's too generic: You probably undersold the Input Sheet. Add more specificity to Fields 3, 5, and 7 and re-run.

The golden rule: If you're rewriting more than 20% of the output, the Input Sheet needed more detail, not the prompt.

STEP 4 — Export to Formats

One input. Four ready-to-use outputs.

By this step, you already have your complete copy. Step 4 is just moving it where it needs to go.

Your Four Outputs

Output 1 — MLS Description

Copy directly into your MLS input field. Watch your character limit (most MLS systems cap at 1,000–2,500 characters). If the description runs long, ask the AI to tighten it: "Shorten this MLS description to under 1,000 characters without losing the opening hook or the emotional tone."

Output 2 — Instagram Caption

Copy into your Instagram scheduling tool (Later, Buffer, Planoly, or directly into Instagram). The hashtags are already included — move them to the first comment if you prefer a cleaner look.

Output 3 — Facebook Post

Copy into Facebook directly or into your scheduling tool. Add the listing photos manually after posting.

Output 4 — Ad Headlines

Save these in a running document (a simple Google Doc or Notion page works fine). When you're ready to run paid ads, your headline set is already written. A/B test the three variations and let performance data tell you which framing resonates with your audience.

The Delivery Stack

Here's where everything lives once you've exported it:

```
□ [Street Address] – Listing Package
|
├─ MLS_Description.txt
├─ Instagram_Caption.txt
├─ Facebook_Post.txt
├─ Ad_Headlines.txt
├─
└─ (Optional) → Send to True North Graphics for designed social graphics + flyer layout
```

If you're on the ListWorks subscription plan, this entire package is delivered to you as a formatted PDF — ready for your sellers, your team, or your brokerage. No file management required.

The Full 90-Second Walkthrough

Let's run the system live with a real example.

The Property:

3-bedroom, 2-bath ranch home in a walkable neighborhood. New kitchen, original hardwood floors, covered patio, two blocks from a popular trail system. Likely buyer: couple, late 30s, upgrading from a condo. Primary appeal: outdoor lifestyle + turnkey condition.

Input Sheet (filled in 60 seconds):

1. PROPERTY TYPE: Single family
2. LOCATION: Mapleton Hill – coffee shops, trailhead 2 blocks, walkable to everything
3. THREE BEST THINGS:
 - Completely redone kitchen with quartz and gas range
 - Original hardwood floors throughout (immaculate)
 - Covered patio that backs to a quiet alley – very private
4. THE BUYER: Late-30s couple, upgrading from condo.
Want space, outdoor access, no projects.
5. LIFESTYLE: "This home is for someone who wants to be outside more – without giving up a great kitchen."
6. FEATURE TRANSLATIONS:
 - New kitchen → so what? They can actually cook now, not work around limitations
 - Hardwoods → so what? The warmth of original character without the renovation timeline
 - Covered patio → so what? Outdoor living that works in the rain
 - Trail access → so what? Saturday morning runs start at the front door
7. THE ONE THING: Turnkey outdoor lifestyle home – rare in this price range
8. NOTHING TO AVOID
11. TONE: Sharp and confident

Time to fill: 55 seconds.

Prompt sent: Master Prompt + Input Sheet pasted. Send.

Time: 8 seconds.

Output received (MLS Description):

Some homes make you want to stay inside. This isn't one of them. Set two blocks from the trailhead in Mapleton Hill, this three-bedroom ranch was made for the buyer who wants to be outside more — without giving anything up to get there. The kitchen was fully redone with quartz countertops, a gas range that means business, and enough counter space to actually use it. The original hardwood floors run through every room, warm and immaculate in the way that only the real thing manages to be. And out back, a covered patio opens onto a quiet alley — private enough to feel like yours, comfortable enough to use in April.

Three bedrooms. Two full baths. No projects waiting. Just a home that's ready to go, in a neighborhood that already is.

Showings start Saturday. This price point in Mapleton Hill doesn't stay patient.

Time to generate: 9 seconds.

Review (20-second check):

- ☐ No banned words
- ☐ First sentence stops the scroll
- ☐ Truthful — nothing overstated
- ☐ Added one local touch (April — nod to Colorado spring weather) → personal fingerprint applied

Total time, start to finish: 92 seconds.

Why This Works (And Why It'll Keep Working)

The 90-Second Workflow isn't a hack. It's a leverage system.

You bring what AI can't: the walk-through, the intuition, the neighborhood knowledge, the relationship with the sellers, the read on the buyer. You know things about that property that will never appear in a data sheet.

The AI brings what you shouldn't have to: the blank-page discipline, the structural consistency, the ability to write in multiple formats simultaneously without any of them getting worse.

Together — your input, its output, your 20-second review — you produce better copy than either of you would alone. Every time. In 90 seconds.

The agents who understand this first will look like they have a staff of copywriters. They won't. They'll just have this.

Chapter Summary

- The 90-Second Workflow has four steps: Input Sheet → Master Prompt → Review → Export
 - The Property Input Sheet is a 12-field template that organizes what you already know
 - The Master Prompt is pre-written and permanent — paste it every time, never rewrite it
 - The 20-second review has three checkpoints: Fingerprint Word, Banned Words, Truthfulness
 - One input produces four outputs: MLS description, Instagram caption, Facebook post, ad headlines
 - The system works because you supply the intelligence; the AI supplies the execution
-

Coming up in Chapter 6: The full ListWorks Prompt Library — every specialized prompt you'll need for luxury listings, fixer-uppers, investment properties, new construction, open houses, and the hardest listings of all: the ones with nothing obvious to say.

— End of Chapter 5 —

BONUS SECTION

The AI-Powered Real Estate Writing System

ListWorks | Exclusive Buyer Bonuses

BONUS 1 — The Quick-Win Prompt Pack

10 Ready-to-Use AI Prompts for the Situations Agents Hate Most

These prompts are copy-paste ready. Drop them into ChatGPT, Claude, or any AI writing tool exactly as written — then fill in the bracketed details. Each one is engineered to get you something usable on the first try.

Prompt 1: "I have nothing good to say about this property."

You are a real estate copywriter. I'm listing a home that is modest — [brief description: e.g., small lot, older finishes, busy street, etc.] — and I'm struggling to write compelling copy without overpromising. Your job is to find the genuine angle: what buyer would love this home and why? Write a 100-word MLS description that leads with the strongest honest benefit, speaks directly to that buyer, and doesn't apologize for what the home is. Do not use filler words like "charming," "cozy," or "nestled." Be specific and confident.

Prompt 2: "The seller is unrealistic about what the home offers."

You are a real estate copywriter helping me navigate a sensitive listing. The seller believes their home is exceptional because [reason: e.g., they renovated the kitchen themselves, it's in a "great" location, they raised their family there]. In reality, the home is [honest description]. Write a 120-word MLS description that honors what the home genuinely offers without fabricating value. Focus on tangible features — square footage, lot size, layout, proximity to [specific location detail]. The goal is to attract a realistic buyer, not set false expectations. Avoid emotional language the seller might expect but buyers won't trust.

Prompt 3: "I need to rewrite a stale listing that's been sitting 60+ days."

You are a real estate copywriter tasked with relaunching a listing that has been on market for [X] days without selling. The current description reads: "[paste existing copy]." Your job is to rewrite it from scratch — new angle, new lead, new energy. Do not recycle the same opening or the same feature order. If the price has been reduced, lead with the value story, not the reduction. Write 120 words for MLS and a separate 3-sentence social media caption framed as "newly positioned" or "back in the spotlight." Avoid anything that signals the listing is stale.

Prompt 4: "I need copy for a listing in a neighborhood I don't know well."

You are a real estate copywriter. I'm listing a property at [address or cross streets] in [city/neighborhood], and I'm not deeply familiar with the area. Here are the home's features: [list key specs — beds, baths, sq ft, notable upgrades]. Write a 120-word MLS description that focuses primarily on the property's physical strengths rather than neighborhood claims I can't verify. Where neighborhood context would help, use general, verifiable language only — school district name, proximity to downtown, major nearby road or landmark. Do not invent lifestyle claims. Make the home itself the hero.

Prompt 5: "The photos are bad but the home is genuinely great."

You are a real estate copywriter. The listing photos for this property are poor quality and won't do the home justice, so the description needs to carry extra weight. The home has the following genuine strengths: [list 4-6 specific features, e.g., vaulted ceilings, original hardwood, oversized lot, updated bathrooms]. Write a 130-word MLS description that is so specific and vivid that a buyer can picture the space clearly without relying on the photos. Use precise measurements, materials, and details wherever possible. The goal is to get buyers through the door in spite of the images — not because of them.

Prompt 6: "I need a price reduction announcement that doesn't feel like defeat."

You are a real estate copywriter. I need to announce a price reduction on a listing — the new price is [price], reduced from [original price]. Do not frame this as a correction or a problem. Write a 3-4 sentence social media post and a 2-sentence email subject line + opening that positions this as a strategic opportunity for the right buyer. Emphasize what the buyer gets at the new price point, not what changed. Use confident, forward-looking language. Do not use the words "reduced," "dropped," "cut," or "lowered." The tone should feel like the seller is opening a door, not backing down.

Prompt 7: "I need an open house invitation that actually gets people to show up."

You are a real estate copywriter. Write an open house invitation for [property address or description] taking place on [day, date, time]. The home's most compelling features are: [list 3 specifics]. Write two versions: (1) a social media post under 100 words with a clear call-to-action and the event details, and (2) a short email invitation with a subject line, 3-sentence body, and closing line. Both versions should create mild urgency without being pushy. Focus on what the attendee will experience when they walk through the door — not just the square footage. Make it feel like an event worth showing up to.

Prompt 8: "I need a Just Sold post that generates seller leads, not just likes."

You are a real estate copywriter. I just sold a home at [address or neighborhood] and want to write a Just Sold post that attracts potential sellers — not just celebrates the transaction. The sale details are: [list price, days on market, any notable facts like multiple offers or above asking]. Write a 3-paragraph social media post. Paragraph 1: the result. Paragraph 2: what made the difference (marketing, timing, strategy — keep it specific). Paragraph 3: a direct, low-pressure invitation for neighbors or anyone thinking about selling to reach out. End with a single-line CTA. Tone: confident, not boastful.

Prompt 9: "I need copy for a listing with an unusual or polarizing feature."

You are a real estate copywriter. This listing has an unusual feature that some buyers will love and others will dismiss: [describe the feature, e.g., no garage, backing to a highway, converted garage space, steep lot, unusual layout]. Your job is not to hide it — it's to find and speak directly to the buyer who sees it as a feature, not a flaw. Write a 120-word MLS description that leads with genuine strengths and addresses the polarizing element honestly, framing it in the best truthful light. Do not bury it at the end. The right buyer will respect the honesty. The wrong buyer was never going to make an offer anyway.

Prompt 10: "I need to write a listing in under 30 seconds — I'm late."

Write a 100-word MLS listing description for a [beds]BR/[baths]BA home in [city]. Key features: [paste or list any available details — sq ft, lot, garage, updates, year built]. Lead with the single strongest selling point. Use short, active sentences. No filler phrases. No generic adjectives. Deliver something I can publish immediately.
(That's the whole prompt. Fast and functional. It works.)

BONUS 2 — The Listing Description Checklist

Before You Hit Publish, Run This 60-Second Check

Print this page. Keep it at your desk. Run through it before every listing goes live.

SECTION A: THE MUST-HAVES

Every listing you publish should have all 10 of these.

- [] 1. A specific, benefit-forward opening line.
Your first sentence is your headline. It should state a concrete reason to keep reading — not announce the home's existence.
- [] 2. At least one hard number in the first 30 words.
Square footage, lot size, ceiling height, garage capacity — specificity signals credibility and helps buyers self-qualify.
- [] 3. The strongest feature of the home appears in the first half.
Buyers skim. If your best asset is buried in sentence seven, most people never see it.
- [] 4. A clear lifestyle sentence.
One line that shows what it feels like to live there — morning light, walkable to coffee, backyard big enough for a garden. Ground the buyer emotionally before they tour.
- [] 5. All upgrades named with approximate age or scope.
"Updated kitchen" is worthless. "Kitchen remodeled in 2022 with quartz counters and new appliances" is not.

- [] 6. Neighborhood or location context (at least one line).
Buyers buy location as much as home. Name the school district, a nearby landmark, or the commute advantage — something real and verifiable.
 - [] 7. A sentence that speaks to the right buyer, not all buyers.
Great copy qualifies leads. If the home is perfect for a growing family, say so. If it's ideal for a remote worker, say that. Trying to appeal to everyone appeals to no one.
 - [] 8. No sentence longer than 25 words.
Long sentences slow readers down and dilute impact. Break them up.
 - [] 9. A closing line with momentum.
End with energy — a call to schedule a showing, a statement about demand, or a one-line summary of the home's best case. Don't just stop mid-thought.
 - [] 10. A final proofread out loud.
If you stumble reading it, a buyer will too. Read it aloud before it goes live. Every time.
-

SECTION B: THE NEVER-DO LIST

Any one of these is a conversion killer. Check for all 10.

- [] 1. Never open with the address or property type.
"Located at 123 Main Street, this 3-bedroom home..." tells the buyer nothing they don't already know. Start with value.
- [] 2. Never use more than two adjectives in a row.
"Gorgeous, stunning, beautifully upgraded..." — buyers tune this out instantly. One well-chosen adjective beats three generic ones.
- [] 3. Never include anything you can't verify.
If you're guessing at the year of the HVAC, write "recently updated." If you don't know the school district rating, don't quote it. One inaccuracy destroys trust in everything else.

- [] 4. Never bury the price reduction or key caveat.
If the home has a known limitation — busy road, small lot, HOA restriction — hiding it attracts the wrong buyer and wastes everyone's time. Honest framing is a skill. Omission is not.
- [] 5. Never write "call for details" in place of an actual detail.
It reads as evasive. If you can't include something, leave it out entirely — don't flag it as withheld.
- [] 6. Never use exclamation points more than once.
One exclamation point is enthusiasm. Two is noise. Three or more is desperation.
- [] 7. Never list features in random order.
Lead with what matters most to buyers. Interior before exterior, living areas before utility, lifestyle before logistics. Structure signals care.
- [] 8. Never write a description longer than 250 words for a standard listing.
More words rarely mean more impact. Tight copy reads as confident. Dense copy reads as filler.
- [] 9. Never copy-paste from a previous listing.
Even if the homes are similar, buyers notice boilerplate — and so does the algorithm. Fresh copy every time.
- [] 10. Never skip the checklist because you're in a hurry.
The listings that cost you most are the ones you published fast and forgot. Sixty seconds now beats a price reduction later.

BONUS 3 — The Banned Words List

The 40 Phrases Killing Your Listings — and What to Write Instead

Every phrase on this list has the same problem: it sounds like something, but says nothing. Replace it with what you actually mean.

CATEGORY 1: Generic Descriptors

Banned Phrase	What to Write Instead
Spacious	Name the actual square footage or room dimensions: "18-ft living room," "1,200 sq ft main floor"
Cozy	Identify what creates the feeling: "wood-burning fireplace," "low-maintenance lot," "single-story layout"
Beautiful	Describe the specific feature that earns that word: "floor-to-ceiling windows," "original crown molding throughout"
Stunning	Name what's actually impressive: "unobstructed mountain views," "soaring 12-ft ceilings"
Gorgeous	Replace with the specific visual detail: "herringbone tile entry," "exposed brick accent wall"
Charming	Pinpoint the source of the charm: "1940s craftsman trim," "covered front porch with swing"
Lovely	Too vague to help any buyer. Use a sensory or structural detail instead: "oak hardwood floors," "bay window with built-in bench"
Modern	Specify the update: "remodeled in 2023," "stainless appliances and quartz counters," "smart thermostat and keyless entry"
Luxurious	Justify it: "heated tile floors," "soaking tub with separate walk-in shower," "custom cabinetry throughout"
Upgraded	Name the upgrade: "new roof (2021)," "tankless water heater," "triple-pane windows"

CATEGORY 2: Weak CTAs

Banned Phrase	What to Write Instead
Must see!	Create real urgency with facts: "Showings book fast — schedule yours before the weekend"
Don't miss out!	Make it specific: "Open house Sunday 1-3 PM — last chance before offers are reviewed"
Won't last long!	If it's true, show why: "Three offers in the first week on a comparable home two streets over"
Call today!	Tell them what to expect: "Schedule a private tour — available evenings and weekends"
Act fast!	Replace with a reason to act: "Seller reviewing offers [date]" or "Only [X] homes available in this price range in [neighborhood]"

CATEGORY 3: Filler Openers

Banned Phrase	What to Write Instead
Welcome to...	Start with the home's best fact: "Vaulted ceilings, a chef's kitchen, and a backyard built for summer"
Nestled in...	Use the actual location detail: "Half a mile from [park/school/downtown], with easy access to [road]"
Situated in...	Same problem. Name the neighborhood advantage: "In the heart of [neighborhood], walkable to [specifics]"
This home has it all	It never does. List the three things it actually has.
Look no further	Buyers already are. Tell them what to look at: "Here's what makes this one different:"

CATEGORY 4: Overused Seller-Speak

Banned Phrase	What to Write Instead
Motivated seller	If true, reflect it in the price — not the copy. This phrase signals desperation to buyers.
Priced to sell	Everything is priced to sell. Use: "Priced $X below comparable homes on [street/area]"
Seller motivated	See above. Cut it entirely.
Best value in the neighborhood	Prove it: "The lowest price per sq ft of any active listing in [zip code]"
Won't find this price again	Buyers hear this constantly. Cite a real market stat instead.
Owner says sell	Cuts your negotiating credibility. Remove. Let the price do the talking.
Bring all offers	Fine to say privately. In public copy, it reads as a plea, not strategy.
As-is	Discloses condition issues without context. If selling as-is, frame the upside: "Priced for a buyer who wants to add their own finishes"
Handyman special	Replace with honest framing: "Priced below market to reflect cosmetic updates needed — bones are solid"
Estate sale	Only use if relevant for pricing context. Buyers associate it with outdated homes; use only when the backstory helps.

CATEGORY 5: Empty Value Claims

Banned Phrase	What to Write Instead
Move-in ready	Specify what makes it ready: "Fresh paint throughout, new carpet, professionally cleaned"
Turn-key	Same issue. Name what's been done: "Updated kitchen and baths, new roof, no deferred maintenance"
Rare find	Only use if you can prove it. If true: "One of only [X] homes in [neighborhood] with a 3-car garage and no HOA"
One of a kind	Agents write this for ordinary homes. If it's genuinely unique, describe exactly what makes it so.
Perfect for entertaining	Show it: "Open-concept kitchen flows to a covered patio with built-in grill and seating for 12"
Pride of ownership	This means nothing to a buyer. Describe what they'll actually see: "Immaculate condition — original owners, meticulously maintained for 22 years"
Great bones	Follow it with specifics: "Original hardwood under carpet, solid wood doors, plaster walls — built when they were building to last"
Endless possibilities	Buyers don't want possibilities — they want clarity. Describe the actual potential: "Unfinished basement already framed for 2 additional bedrooms and full bath"
Too many upgrades to list	Then list the top five. This phrase makes buyers suspicious you're hiding the bad ones.
Something for everyone	This is the softest possible writing. Who is this home for? Say it directly.

THE RULE BEHIND THE LIST

Every banned phrase on this list commits the same fundamental crime: it tells buyers what to feel instead of showing them what to see. Words like "stunning," "move-in ready," and "rare find" are emotional shortcuts — lazy substitutes for the specific details that actually earn those reactions. When a buyer reads "soaring 12-foot ceilings and original hardwood floors refinished in 2023," they feel it. When they read "stunning interior," they scroll. The principle is simple and it is permanent: specificity is credibility. The more precisely you describe a home, the more confidently a buyer can picture themselves in it — and the more trustworthy you sound as the agent who knows it.

YOU NOW HAVE AN UNFAIR ADVANTAGE

Most agents will keep writing the same tired listings. They'll default to "spacious and charming" because that's what everyone else does, because it's fast, because no one ever told them there was a better way. You now know better. You've got a system — prompts you can run in 60 seconds, a checklist that catches the mistakes before they cost you, and a vocabulary filter that removes the words that were quietly killing your conversions. That's not a small thing. That's the difference between a listing that sits and one that sells.

What you've learned in this guide is a foundation. But real estate marketing is a moving target — new platforms, shifting buyer behavior, AI tools that improve every month. That's why ListWorks built a subscription for agents who want to stay ahead without spending hours on copy every week. For $49/month, you get fully built listing marketing packages — MLS descriptions, social captions, ad copy, the works — delivered for every listing, every time, with no learning curve and no guesswork. It's the system doing the work, so you can focus on the clients.

If this guide gave you value, the subscription will give you more of it — consistently, reliably, listing after listing. When you're ready to stop writing from scratch and start showing up with copy that converts, subscribe at ListWorks.io. Your next listing deserves it.

ListWorks — Real Estate Copy That Sells.
